Descrierea cursului: Democracy as an ideal form of government was interpreted and realized differently across time in various parts of the world. Every attempt to establish democratic institutions in countries or world regions, their relative success, forms of organization and basis of stability, as well as the threats against them, are part of a global democratic history, which connects interpretations of the past with present experiences and future aspirations. In this context, democratic collective memory plays a central role. It shapes history, creates cultures of remembrance and memory sites in museums, memorials and archives, and awakes moral emotions across generations, influencing political and rule making decisions.

In this course, the topic of democratic collective memories will be discussed from an international and transdisciplinary perspective, including psychology, law, political science, history, sociology, education, archeology and cultural studies. Fostering cooperation within the CIVIS network, this course aims to make students aware that global democratic issues do not have simple solutions and demand cooperation between different academic specializations and multiple stakeholders. Moreover, the contact with researchers and students from different countries where democratic memories are dealt with differently, will support the development of critical thinking, opening new possibilities for international agreements as well as European and global solutions.

Descrierea cursului:

Cities have a significant role to play in advancing democracy and citizenship. In an urban world, cities are both home and local political context for most people. As centres of social life, economy and resource use, cities are also key sites for dealing with global challenges like climate change. Citizen “co-creation” is an important means of opening-up multi-directional, horizontal dialogues and decision-making processes between government and civil society. But it necessitates experimentation and institutional change, which can be difficult for local governments because of rigid structures and a lack of resources. There are also concerns over the extent to which citizens can genuinely influence government. Hence critical engagement with local concepts and practices of ‘co-creation’ is necessary to identify challenges and ways forward.

The module develops comparative and interdisciplinary knowledge of co-creation in local government and examines its potential to address urban challenges. The international (Brussels, Bucharest, Glasgow, Rome, Tübingen) and interdisciplinary background of staff and students (Political Science, Geography, Planning, Urban Design and Urban Studies) will help develop multi-faceted, comparative insights. Learning will occur in blended formats including online roundtables with participating staff and students and a 5-day meeting in Rome incorporating in-person learning activities.

Descrierea cursului: The course seeks to train Masters and PhD students in the study of documents of the Greco-Roman Egypt. The course aims to train students in papyrology and its issues through both theory and practice. Students will first follow a cycle of ten two-hour lessons, which will consist of lectures devoted to a particular theme, in order to provide students with the necessary theoretical and conceptual foundations. The physical mobility will build on this knowledge and focus on practice. Each student will be given a fragment of papyrus from the Brussels collection to study, edit, analyse and interpret, with the help of the teachers.

Descrierea cursului: This course will allow students to discover the contents (genres, topics, characters) and contexts (times, places, and modes of reading) of texts of entertainment. It will also show them how to distinguish between works of entertainment recommended for women and those actually read by female audiences, readings aimed at laymen and those for religious, the entertainment books aimed at education and training, of young people as well as princes, the best-sellers that circulated in early modern Europe, their physical aspects (format, paper, etc) and the price at which they were sold, the libraries in which they were stored and the routes they took to get from the printing press to the hands of their readers.

The course will also take into account the languages of entertainment readings, their translations as a vehicle for their European circulation, the relationship between writing and reading, and also the role of orality in the dissemination of stories and characters. This BIP adopts a transnational and comparative approach, exploring our key themes from a pan-

European perspective and highlighting the consequences of cross-cultural exchanges between different European countries. The project aims thus to offer students a wide variety of critical and methodological approaches to early modern entertainment literature.
